Ask Pam

Pam,
I am responding to last week’s Ask Pam question. Many people CHOOSE not to pay attention and use their computers. However, taking away computer entirely harms those people that have CHosen to use their computers to take notes, view the slides, research related information for discussion, etc. Why would we, as a University community, want to allow their education to be harmed to force those who don’t WANT to pay attention to do so? Instead of having this discussion, wouldn’t our time be better spent implementing teaching methods which engage students so they would want to pay attention?

Richard Laager

Dear Richard, Thanks for your input about the computer dilemma we seem to be in on our campus. It is a really important question. I know that you of course are an exceptional student and do pay attention in class or use the computer for the areas that you mention above that do enhance your learning. My understanding is that a faculty member has the right to set the classroom environment up in the manner they feel will most enable and support student learning. Some have chosen to have this mean that computers are not allowed and again this is an individual faculty call and not a university policy. I am sure we will continue to have dialogue about this in the future as our hope is that the students leave UMC with the very best education possible.

Reproductive Health

For those students who are interested in various aspects of reproductive health and are wondering what local agencies address these needs, the following agencies assist those who are interested in being tested for sexually transmitted diseases, annual gynecological exams, emergency contraception, contraceptives and pregnancy testing. These agencies provide services based on your income. Also, please feel free to visit with Stacey Grunewald, RN at the Student Health Office, 145F Student Center, with any questions regarding reproductive health needs (phone 281-8512). Do you know that you are part of DIVERSITY?

If your heritage or ethnicity is Norwegian, Scandinavian, Irish, Native American, African American, Asian, Hispanic, or German you belong to the diversity people of the WORLD! If your race is North American culture is built on the myth that we are all immigrants and everyone has equal opportunities to succeed and “live.” There is different interpretation about diversity: The Philosopher John Dewey’s views “diversity as human nature and community”… “grounded [by] science (as a way of knowing) and democracy (as way of life) in a respect for diverse opinion.” Other definitions of Diversity includes “social group identities that shape and define our individual identities: race, ethnicity, culture, home language, religion, gender, sexual orientation, social class, age, and disability.” The Pillsbury Company, well know for its workplace diversity initiatives, describes diversity simply as “all the ways in which we differ.” At UMC we define diversity as “individuals who are different in some ways and similar in others” (Thomas, 1999).
